

Life in Britain during World War One

'On the day I found out that Britain was going to war I still had to go to school as usual. I was told it meant big changes, but my mum still made me do my homework that day and I still played out on the field with Albert afterwards like we did every day!

'But then the changes came - my dad and big brother Brian had to go and be soldiers, and we have a lot less to eat back here at home than we used to - that's because there needs to be more food for the soldiers! We have to queue ages for food at the shop now and it's a lot more expensive. My mum works now too - she didn't use to. She works on the tram every day. With dad away and mum working a lot, I have to sort myself out most of the time and I have a lot more jobs to do around the house too!

'We make sure all the lights are dimmed at night now. We do that because we're scared it might be a target for the German Zeppelins (airships they use for bombing)! We have these black-out blinds to make sure no light can be seen outside.'

Rupert, 11

Life in Britain during World War One

'On the day I found out that Britain was going to war I still had to go to school as usual. I was told it meant big changes, but my mum still made me do my homework that day and I still played out on the field with Albert afterwards like we did every day!

'But then the changes came - my dad and big brother Brian had to go and be soldiers, and we have a lot less to eat back here at home than we used to - that's because there needs to be more food for the soldiers! We have to queue ages for food at the shop now and it's a lot more expensive. My mum works now too - she didn't use to. She works on the tram every day. With dad away and mum working a lot, I have to sort myself out most of the time and I have a lot more jobs to do around the house too!

'We make sure all the lights are dimmed at night now. We do that because we're scared it might be a target for the German Zeppelins (airships they use for bombing)! We have these black-out blinds to make sure no light can be seen outside.'

Rupert, 11